

Two Gods by Gary Bate

There is this philosophy that states that we're all really gods in sheep's clothing (genetic garments), but I think that's a stretch too far for most people – as most people are wrestling with their emotions, their control dramas and sexuality to boot. Is that coincidental or by deliberate design?

Stephen Fry has just sprung to my mind and I am reminded that he argues that there cannot be a God because babies are born with this and that condition or disablement. A rational argument?

I've been a keen observer and writer for many years and here's what I've pieced together:

There is a God, which the religions allude to and he is the self-appointed God of this domain (this World and its governing 'Light' realm). He rules over us by exercising all aspects of control, which is consistent with how his worshippers rule here (our ruling elite families and our political leaders).

There is another GOD that is the source of all life and is life itself. This God can only Love and we gradually see it in ourselves, in other people and in our precious animals.

Love has no place in the consciousness of control and thus the God 'of all life' has no business here, apart from allowing life to exist. The finger connection to this God is the Love in the synapse.

So if you pray to the controlling God, he's not going to help you because he's only interested in maintaining complete control over you.

Now some people call this Worldly God a fallen angel amongst other things; but before we jump to any kind of judgement upon him, we must firstly look at our own lives and all of the control dramas and emotions going on. Yes, he has his helpers; but what are they doing? They're agitating us and feeding upon the resultant emotional energy we produce from the control dramas we're involved in!

The over-riding consciousness of this World is control and we're all a part of it – until we make different choices.

To pray to the loving God, you firstly have to meet this God on his/her ground, which is LOVE. If you're coming from any other place, you're praying to the controlling God.

There are Two Gods, which one do you align with?

So Mr Fry, there's a reason why everyone was born the way they were born and to whom they were born and where they were born and it's got fuck all to do with any God.

The God 'of all life' is not going to descend to meet us in this pit; it's enough to sustain our lives here. If we want a relationship with this God then it is we who have to draw nearer to him or her.

The God of control cannot operate in the 'loving' domains above him because he is incompatible with them. The God of love has no need to descend into this squabble, yet their hand is always extended and waiting for us to connect. We always have that choice.

The fast-track way to ascend and meet the higher God is to become a 'giver' – just give and give and give and give, without any conditions or expectations of any kind.
